REPLY COMMENTS OF VIACOM INC.

- 1. Viacom Inc. ("Viacom") respectfully submits the following reply comments with respect to the above-captioned petition for rulemaking ("Petition"). Viacom's program services are neither affiliated nor vertically integrated with cable systems.
- 2. The FCC has requested comments on Ameritech New Media, Inc.'s ("Ameritech") petition for rulemaking to amend certain aspects of the program access rules which generally require vertically integrated programmers to make their programming services available to all MVPDs on a non-discriminatory basis. The rules also generally preclude cable-exclusive distribution by such vertically integrated program services.² Ameritech's Petition requests three specific amendments to the rules: first, permit discovery as of right at the election of the complainant; second, require that program access complaints be resolved within 90 days of filing the complaint in cases where the complainant has not elected discovery and within 150 days of ¹Viacom, through affiliates, owns and operates: the premium program services Showtime, The Movie Channel and FLIX; the advertiser-supported program services Nickelodeon (comprising the Nickelodeon and Nick at Nite programming blocks); MTV: Music Television and VH1/Music First; and the basic program services Nick at Nite's TV Land and M2: Music Television. Viacom also through affiliates holds partnership interests in USA Network, the Sci-Fi Channel, All News Channel, Sundance Channel and (in partnership with a Time Warner affiliate) Comedy Central.

filing where discovery has been elected; and third, impose economic penalties in the form of forfeitures and/or the award of monetary damages for Section 548 violations.

- 3. Viacom did not file in the initial round of comments on the Petition because, as a non-vertically integrated satellite cable programming vendor to whom 47 USC §548 does not apply, Viacom has no direct interest in the procedural enforcement mechanisms adopted by the Commission with respect to this matter.
- 4. However, DIRECTV, Inc. ("DIRECTV") in its comments expressed support for a proceeding, should the Commission elect to commence one, to "fine tune" the program access rules so as to encompass cable programming delivered terrestrially and to examine, as well, whether and under what circumstances the rules should be extended to cover non-vertically integrated programmers.³ Although not stated explicitly, DIRECTV's suggestions imply and surely must be read to suggest that the Commission commence an inquiry for purposes of making recommendations to Congress; without a clear statutory mandate, which is now lacking, the Commission lacks the legal authority to extend the program access rules either to terrestrially delivered transmissions or to entities other than (i) vertically integrated cable operators, or (ii) common carriers engaging in the delivery of video services directly to subscribers.
- 5. DIRECTV's proposals have previously been presented to the Commission by several entities whose business interests are aligned with those of DIRECTV.⁴ The Commission has at least twice previously found no reason to recommend extension of the program access rules in the manner suggested.⁵ In its instant filing, DIRECTV offers no evidence of the need for its proffered extension of the rules other than to recite the Commission's own precautionary admonition concerning possible future, but as yet inchoate, developments with respect to delivery of programming by terrestrial means in lieu of satellite if motivated for purposes of evading the access requirements. With respect to extending the rule to encompass non-vertically integrated programmers, there is no justification or evidence of behavior (either empirically, anecdotally or otherwise) which would justify an expenditure of the Commission's resources to investigate whether such a recommendation to Congress is warranted. As Viacom stated in a prior filing on this same matter:

Rather than relying on arm's length negotiations, commentors arguing extension of the program access rules seek to obtain a regulatory sword to be used against non-vertically integrated programmers. In effect, these parties urge the Commission to find that the proper way to deal with the market power they believe large cable operators exert over programmers is to extend the benefit of that market power to all distributors. The Commission should reject these overt attempts to "punish the victim," rather than the alleged perpetrators.⁶

6. As Viacom has also previously stated⁷, extension of the program access rules to non-vertically programmers would not promote competition. Rather, it would impede the development of new and established program services by restricting the flow of capital to these services. More concretely, but no less importantly, it is without question that the program access rules adopted by Congress in 1992 and implemented by the Commission in 1993 were designed to constrain the perceived market power of cable operators; they were not intended to, and consequently do not, regulate the programming industry per se.

7. Conclusion. For the reasons set forth above, Viacom urges the Commission to reject DIRECTV's suggestions to consider commencing an inquiry to review the issue of expanding the program access rules.

Respectfully submittted,

Viacom Inc.
